Foreword

It has been a long time since English became the language of science. Today, in medical practices, including almost all specialties, professionals are constantly exposed to the English language when going through their related literature. We do think that unless you know enough English, it is impossible to keep up to date with medical advances. Whenever we attend international medical meetings, we see how some colleagues struggle in trying to converse with and understand their English speaking counterparts.

The present work is like a breath of fresh air with regard to many problems facing the medical students and practitioners when dealing with English materials in their fields. We intend to turn the wearisome task into an amusing close-up inside of professional medical English, but bearing in mind that no result is achieved without effort. The materials aim at doctors, medical students, nursing and midwifery students and others with a professional interest in medicine who need to improve their English. The course is flexible and can be used in class, on your own or both. Within each unit you will find separate sections which practice reading, listening, vocabulary development and communicating. We remind the readers that the aim of this book is to teach English, not medicine because as medical sciences advance rapidly, it is no secret that by the time you read this book, fresh views in the light of further research may appear.
